

Assessment for trainees

23 January 2012 | London

Making the most of workplace-based assessment: a workshop for trainees

There are many misconceptions about the workplace-based assessments undertaken by trainees. This interactive and practical workshop aims to empower trainees to use the workplace-based assessments in a self-directed, proactive and ultimately career-enhancing way to improve the quality of their learning.

In this workshop, you will learn about the purpose of the various assessment methods and how they can help you in your development. The differences between appraisal and assessment will be discussed, as will the roles of the trainee, clinical supervisors and educational supervisors in the assessment process.

You will be able to identify and maximise opportunities for workplace-based assessment, as well as understand how reflective practice and self-direction can make the workplace-based assessments an empowering and useful educational opportunity. This workshop will also enable you to prepare effectively for the ARCP, with a view to improving the training experience.

By the end of this workshop, you will be able to:

- recognise the difference, and the relationship between, assessment and appraisal
- practise using workplace-based assessments
- use workplace-based assessments to enhance learning
- prepare effectively for the ARCP
- maximise the opportunities presented by the assessment process.

As with all of our workshops, delegate numbers will be limited to allow an intimate learning environment. You will be given ample scope for discussion with peers, enabling you to share experiences and benefit from one to one development, as well as small group work.
